THE OLD SILK MILL

Those who frequent Derby have undoubtedly come across the stunning painting on the side of the Silk Mill pub, on the edge of the city centre. It looks somewhat out of place and at a quick glance, could be mistaken for street art. However, this mural holds much more significance than being just a pretty picture. It's perhaps true that a picture paints a thousand words and that was certainly the aim of those who picked up their paintbrushes over 30 years ago, to commemorate an event not only significant in Derbyshire but one of the most important moments in the country's history. What started as the sacking of one worker turned into an employee strike stretching from 1883 into 1834 - which became known as the Silk Mill Trade's Lock-out. Many historians argue that the event that inspired the mural played a pivotal role in the rise of class consciousness in English society, in the nineteenth century. In fact, it was perhaps the first national example of the development of working-class identity, as Derby workers attempted to gain back some control from their overbearing employers.
